Blackstone Early Insights Essay

From a young age I established an exceptional work ethic that has propelled me through various life-molding experiences to become the leader I am today. From carrying my first golf bag in fifth grade to befriending influential business people, my path to becoming a Chick Evans Caddie Scholar at Northwestern University is truly what sets me apart from other candidates. I have set expectations for myself to do what it takes as a leader to flourish and I would like to contribute this drive to succeed at Blackstone.

During high school, my mom passed her Series 7 to become a financial advisor; this opened my eyes to a career in finance. As I started my portfolio early on, I found myself very interested in the U.S. equities market. These instances sparked my curiosity in economics, allowing learning application to the markets and a conceptual understanding of trends and cycles. With a knack for analyzing situations economically, I will be able to stay ahead of the fast-paced dynamic environment.

My perspectives from student group involvement tie directly into Blackstone's culture. As a sector leader in Northwestern's premier finance group, Northwestern Capital Management, I manage a team of six members required to pitch stocks based upon quantitative and qualitative analysis. As the market is always changing, I'm required to stay updated on dynamic current events and ensure my pitches are high quality.

Lastly, my personal experiences are unparalleled compared to many my age. I attended Berkshire Hathaway's Annual Meeting this year and heard Warren Buffett and Charlie Munger discuss their outlook on the economy. However, the Annual Meeting didn't compare to the ninety minutes I spent in Warren Buffett's office speaking with him as he offered advice on how to begin my career in the financial services industry. He mentioned that "Nothing bad ever happens, unless it deals with health." Spinning off the mantra that everything happens for a reason. This rare opportunity is a time I look back upon for wise words.

I would be thrilled to bring my diverse experiences to Blackstone and make an impact on the dynamic culture. My leadership and sales experience in the golf industry that caters to high net worth clients will provide me with the ability to adapt and satisfy teams' and clients' needs in the dynamic workplace that is Blackstone.
