Finding Remote Finance Internships

A four-step search for roles that never reach the job boards

The Four Steps

Step 1 Stop starting on the big boards. Every LinkedIn and Indeed listing is you and five hundred other people, late.

Step 2 Work five subreddits. Hiring managers post in plain language, and karma gates keep most throwaway scam accounts out.

Step 3 Run the search bar on X. Four words in order — hiring, your role, remote, DM. Real-time posts, written by the founder.

Step 4 Comment publicly, DM privately. Same hour, both channels. This is the step almost nobody does.

Why the Big Boards Fail You

A role reaches LinkedIn or Indeed only once a requisition, a title and a budget exist — the end of the process, not the start. By then aggregators have copied it everywhere and a filter reads you before a person does.

The listing is public, so your alert is everyone else's alert.

Hundreds apply on the first day, and you are ranked by keyword match.

Small teams with one finance hire often skip the boards entirely.

Apply there anyway — it costs nothing. Just stop treating it as the search itself.

The Five Subreddits

Founders and hiring managers post here before anything formal exists — usually because they need help this month.

r/remotejobs — general remote listings, frequently posted by the person hiring.

r/forhire — two-sided: [Hiring] and [For Hire] tags, so you can also post yourself.

r/digitalnomad — remote-first companies, often small and listed nowhere else.

r/cscareerquestions — tech-heavy, but fintech and analyst roles surface in the threads.

r/remotework — lower volume, less picked over, useful for policy and openings.

The karma gates are the point: a fresh throwaway cannot post. Still verify the company, and never pay to be hired.

The Search Bar on X

Do not scroll the feed — type the query, and sort by Latest rather than Top. You want recency, not engagement.

hiring finance intern remote DM hiring analyst intern remote DM

Swap the role word and rerun: FP&A, equity research, accounting, bookkeeping.

Save the search. Refresh it every morning — these posts are buried within hours.

These are posts founders write themselves, minutes old, before the role ever reaches a board.

Comment Publicly, DM Privately

Both, within the same hour. The comment puts your name at the top of the thread; the DM is where the pitch goes.

Comment one line: the role, one relevant thing you have built, nothing else.

DM with a link, not an attachment — resume, a model, a short writeup.

Reference the post specifically. Anything that reads as a template is ignored.

Follow up once, a week later, then leave it alone.

Founders hire the person who answered first and sounded like a person. That is most of it.

Putting It Together

One board listing is you against five hundred. The same role, found the day it was written, is you against ten. The edge is being early, and early is a habit — run the five subs and the saved search every morning before you judge the method.

Schedule a Call Directly with Chase to Learn about 1-on-1 Mentorship:

wallstalpha.com/apply